Excellent. Nice doing business with you. You should Tweet something like "Feb 1st looking like Hillary's last day" and link to the story. That will drive your colleagues nuts.

Also, if you find yourself going back into the story, or if it's easy to do, can you please note that I said it during an interview with CNN, something to make it clear that I didn't call you in and have an exclusive conversation about her departure. Basically, that you lifted it from an interview to be featured as part of CNN's wonderful Inauguration coverage.

UPDATED: CNN Plays SIX Times More Convention Videos From Dems Than GOP

CNN has clearly favored Democrats during their convention by playing more of their pre-produced videos during its first three days than they did during the entire Republican convention. So far, the liberal network has played 16 video montages and anti-Donald Trump featurettes totaling 47 minutes and 53 minutes of air time — all during their prime time coverage (8 pm Eastern to midnight) of the political confab. By contrast, CNN only played three of the Republican convention's videos, which added up to 14 minutes and 17 seconds of air time over four nights.

[UPDATE, July 29: During the last night of the Democratic convention, CNN ran two more DNC-produced videos, including the lengthy profile of Hillary Clinton. This brings the number of videos they ran during the convention to 18, six times more than they aired for the GOP convention, totalling 62 minutes of airtime.]

The network skipped playing the GOP's videos on the Benghazi terror attack scandal and on the Fast and Furious gunrunning scandal during its first evening. The Republicans had planned to include one video during the second night, but it got preempted by the roll call of the states. CNN finally ran two of the pro-produced videos from the Republican National Convention on its third evening. However, the first commemorated the 47th anniversary of the

Before the CNN newsman launched down the path to asking questions of the nation's political leaders, he went to film school in California for a year.

He then worked as a campaign press secretary for Marjorie Margolies-Mezvinsky, a Democrat who would go on to represent Pennsylvania's 13th District. Mezvinsky is now mother-in-law to former first daughter Chelsea Clinton.

After moving to public relations, Tapper took a side job as a cartoonist.

In 1992, Tapper served as a Campaign Press Secretary for Democratic congressional candidate Marjorie Margolies-Mezvinsky, a congressional press secretary.<sup>[19]</sup> Tapper also worked for Powell Tate, a Washington, D.C., public relations firm run by Debra Tate. Tapper also worked briefly for Handgun Control, Inc. (now the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence) in 1997.

Tapper wrote several articles as a freelance writer, and then began his full-time journalism career in 1998 for two years at Salon. While there, Tapper wrote an article about going on a date with Monica Lewinsky,<sup>[20]</sup> which skewered Washington

Immediately following the passage of the AHCA last Thursday, a talking point emerged: If this bill became a law, being raped or sexually assaulted would qualify as pre-existing conditions and, therefore, would make it much harder for the victim to get health insurance.

Not so, according to Washington Post Fact-Checker Michelle Ye Hee Lee, who gave the claim "Four Pinocchios" -- meaning it was "totally false." Wrote Lee:

"The notion that AHCA classifies rape or sexual assault as a preexisting condition, or that survivors would be denied coverage, is false...this claim relies on so many factors — including unknown decisions by a handful of states and insurance companies — that this talking point becomes almost meaningless."

Gerges, "Osama bin Laden's growing anxiety"
Christian Science Monitor, October 26, 2007

But bin Laden's troubles transcend Iraq. Prominent clerics and former militants call into question the very legitimacy of bin Laden's authority as a spokesman for Islam and Muslims. And last month, one of bin Laden's most prominent Saudi mentors, the preacher and scholar Salman al-Odah, wrote an open letter reproaching him for "fostering a culture of suicide bombings that has caused bloodshed and suffering and brought ruin to entire Muslim communities and families."

Bin Laden's Al Qaeda was dealt another shattering blow from within when one of its top theorists, Abdul-Aziz el-Sherif, renounced its extremes, including the killing of civilians and the choosing of targets based on religion and nationality. In the past few months, Mr. El-Sherif — a longtime associate of Zawahiri, who crafted what became known as Al Qaeda's guide to jihad — called on militants to desist from terrorism and authored a dissenting rebuttal against his former cohorts.

In early October, Abdulaziz al-Ashaikh, the grand mufti of Saudi Arabia, issued a fatwa prohibiting Saudis from engaging in jihad abroad and accused both bin Laden and Arab regimes of "transforming our youth into walking bombs to accomplish their own political and military aims."

Zakaria, *Post-American World 2.0
2011, p. 14-15

Since 9/11, Western commentators have been calling on moderate Muslim leaders to condemn jihadist ideology, issue fatwas against suicide bombing, and denounce Al Qaeda. Since about 2006, they've begun to do so in significant numbers. In 2007, one of bin Laden's most prominent Saudi mentors, the preacher and scholar Salman al-Odah, wrote an open letter criticizing him for "fostering a culture of suicide bombings that has caused bloodshed and suffering, and brought ruin to entire Muslim communities and families." That same year Abdulaziz al ash-Sheikh, the grand mufti of Saudi Arabia, issued a fatwa prohibiting Saudis from engaging in jihad abroad and accused both bin Laden and Arab regimes of "transforming our youth into walking bombs to accomplish their own political and military aims." One of Al Qaeda's own top theorists, Abdul-Aziz el-Sherif, renounced its extremism, including the killing of civilians and the choosing of targets on the basis of religion and nationality. Sherif—a longtime associate of Zawahiri who crafted what became known as Al Qaeda's guide to jihad—has called on militants to desist from terrorism, and authored a rebuttal of his former cohorts.

Politico's Dylan Byers and instead pointed him to the statement it had written weeks earlier, saying it "found nothing that gives us cause for concern" in Zakaria's work. And following weeks of silence on the issue, CNN's media reporter Brian Stelter tweeted Sunday that he was "pursuing the story" and "trying to get an interview" with Zakaria.

That the network's own media reporter would have to "try" to get a quote from one of its own hosts over widely-documented plagiarism says everything about the dynamic at play here. Why would CNN defer to Zakaria on answering for why he plagiarized on their network? And what could he possibly say in his defense? That stealing material is defensible if the people who publicize it go by names that sound like third-rate Pokemon? Reporters have claimed as much publicly and in requests for interviews. They've told us that without going public, we can't expect Zakaria

One year ago, on the 16th of November 2009 a Russian lawyer died in a Moscow pre-trial detention centre. His name was Sergei Magnitsky. His death fuelled outrage among politicians and world leaders and in the streets of Moscow. Sergei Magnitsky is arrested after he uncovers the largest tax fraud in Russian history

Clover, "Putin is booed at martial arts fight"
Financial Times, November 20, 2011

Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin was loudly booed on Sunday by the crowd at a martial arts fight in Moscow, an unheard of comedown for the man who is supposed to return to the presidency next year.

Many are tired of Mr Putin's trademark authoritarian methods and fearful that his presidency could herald a period of national stagnation. "The crowd at a 'no rules fighting' match booed the champion of 'no rules elections'" quipped KermlinRussia, an anonymous joke Twitter feed.

"What In The World?" Segment

On the 16th of November, 2009, a Russian lawyer died in a Moscow detention center. His name was Sergei Magnitsky. Magnitsky's death fuelled outrage on the streets of Moscow. His only crime was to uncover the largest tax fraud in Russian history: $230 million in rebates, falsely claimed by corrupt government officials who in effect stole the money from the Russian state.

on power. But there are some signs of restlessness. Last week Prime Minister Vladimir Putin was booed by a crowd at a martial arts fight in Moscow.

"KermlinRussia," an anonymous joke Twitter feed, said it best:

"The crowd at a 'no rules fighting' match booed the champion of 'no rules elections.'"

So why did we do it? Why didn't anyone else? In the month that's passed since our first post, no actual journalist has publicly followed up with further examples. And despite the scale and continuation of the plagiarism, the response from Zakaria and his bosses have been striking in their lack of honesty or any sense of obligation to viewers and readers. CNN, TIME, and the Washington Post's editorial page editor Fred Hiatt were quick to give Zakaria their wholehearted support, while Newsweek, Foreign Affairs, Atlantic Media and publisher W.W. Norton have not even replied to requests by Poynter's Andrew Beaujon for comment. After being confronted with Zakaria's most recent and largest cache of theft last week, CNN declined to comment to Politico's Dylan Byers and instead pointed him to the statement it had written weeks earlier, saying it "found nothing that gives us cause for concern" in Zakaria's work. And following weeks of silence on the issue, CNN's media reporter Brian Stelter tweeted Sunday that he was "pursuing the story" and "trying to get an interview" with Zakaria.
